Harper's Magazine. In 1783 South Carolina was completely overrun by the British. Lord Cornwallis held quiet possession of Charleston, had defeated Gates and DeKalb at Camden, driven Marion to the swamps of Pee Dee, scattered the forces of Sumter, and established his headquarters in the Waxhaws, on the border of North Carolina, while Tarleton had his on the Hanging Rock Creek, about thirty miles North of Camden. Davie alone was left with a small force on the West bank of the Catawba making occasional sorties to harass the outposts of the British.

The Scotch-Irish and the Hugenots of South Carolina were mostly Whigs, or rebels. The English colonists were divided; the majority were Whige; but there were a goodly number of loyal men among them who conscientiously espoused the cause of the mother country, and were called Tories.

Lancaster county was one of the strong-Laucaster county was one of the strong-holds of the Whigs. The Milwains, Truesdales, Douglasses, Cunninghams, Twittys, McDonalds, McMullens, Mack-eys, and others of Scotch Irish origin occupied and held the Southern portion o Lancaster, and Chas. Mackey was their acknowledged leader; while the Crawfords, Dunlaps, Jacksons (General Jack-son was then sixteen years old), Whites, Masseys, Dodys, Curetons, and others of the same stock held the Waxhaws, in the Northern sections of the county. The Whigs had always made Lancaster too hot for the Tories, and had ruthles-ly driven them out of the county to seek companionship and sympathy wherever they might find it. But the advent of the British turned the tide completely, and now the Tories with Tarleton's aid drove the Whigs from Lancaster, some across the Catawba to join Davie, and some to the Pee Dee to join Marion. Charles Mackey, as the leader of his band, had made himself very obnoxious to the Tories, and they impatiently awaited a time of vengeance.

He was a man of medium size, very active and energetic, a fine horseman, a splendid shot, impulsive, hot-headed often running unnecessary risks, and doing dare devit deeds. No work was too hazardous for him

Lydia Mackey, his wife, was a woman of good common sense, with a clear head and fine judgment, and in coolness and self-posession far superior to her impetu-ous husband. They had a young family of two or three children, and Charles Mackey had not seen or heard from them for several weeks. Their home was not more than two and a half miles from Tarleton's camp on the Hanging Rock Creek. He knew very well that it would be hazardous for him to return to his home so near to Tarleton's headquarters, but his anxiety became so intense on account of his wife's peculiar condition that he could no longer remain in doubt about it. So he cautiously made his way home, where he unwisely loitered for a week, and during this time he had the temerity to enter Tarleton's lines more than once in search of information which would be valuable to his country's

Charles Mackey's house was a double log cabin, with cultivated patches of corn and potatoes on either side of the lane leading to the front, while at the rear was a kitchen garden of half an acre or more, extending back to a huckleberry swamp, which was almost impenetrable to man or beast. This swamp covered an area of ten or fifteen acres and was sur-rounded by quagmire from ten to thirty feet wide, thus making practically an island. It was entered by jumping from tussock to tussock of moss-covered lumps of mould a foot or two in diameter, and black semi-jelly like mire, which shook in every direction in passing over it. A plank of fence served as a temporary draw-bridge, which was pulled into the swamp after crossing over.

When the county was infested by Tories Charles Mackey spont his days i the zwamp, if not scouting. At night he ventured home. He had good watchdogs, and they gave the alarm when any one approached, whether by day or by night. It at night, he would immediately lift a loose plank in the floor of his bedroom, drop through on the ground, crawl out in the rear, then run thirty or forty yards across the garden, gun in hand, and disappear in the swamp, pulling his fence railing draw-bridge in after him. There was no approach to the house from the

Charles Mackey had been at home now about a week, and was on the eve of leaving with some valuable information for the rebel generals, gained by his night prowlings in and about the headquarters of Colonel Tarleton. But early in a June morning (an hour or two before day) his usually faithful watchdogs failed to give warning of the approach of strangers, and the first notice of their presence was their shouting "Helle!" in front of the house. Mrs. Mackey jumped out of bed, threw open the window shutter, stuck out her head, surveyed the half dozen armed horsemen carefully, and said, "Who's there?" "Friends. Is Charley Mackey at

She promptly answered, "No."

In the meantime Charley had raised the loose plank in the floor, and was ready to make for the swamp in the rear, when, stopping for a moment to be sure of the character of his visitors, he heard the spokesman say: "Well, we are very sorry indeed, for there was a big fight yesterday on Lynch's Creek between General Marion and the British, and we routed the——redcoats completely: routed the redcoats completely; and we have been sent to General Davie at Landsford with orders to unite with Marion at Flat Rock as soon as possible, and then attack Tarleton. We don't know the way to Landsford, and came by for Charley to pilot us."

Mrs. Mackey was always cool and collected, and she said she was very sorry her husband was not at home. But her husband was just the reverse, hot headed and impetuous. This sudden news of victory, after so many reverses, was so in accordance with his wishes that he madly rushed out into the midst of the mounted men, hurrabing for Marion and Davie, and shouting vengeance on the redcoats and Tories; and he began to shake hands enthusiastically with the

The officer told her that the Colonel was on parade and would not return for two hours—not unil he came in for his mid day meal,

Mrs. Mackey was a comely woman of superior intelligence, and she soon inter-ested the young officer in her sad condition. He expressed for her the deepest sympathy, told her that her husband had been tried and sentenced to death at sun-rise to-morrow morning; and that he the evidence given against him by the Torics was of the most positive kind. He told her that Colonel Tarleton was as cruel and unfeeling as he was brave and

"However," said he, "I will prepare the necessary document for your hus-band's release, filling in the blanks, so that it will only be necessary to get Col. Tarleton's signature. At twelve o'clock Col. Tarleton rode up, ismounted, and entered the adjoining

"You must wait till he dines," said the officer. "Another charge will then be brought forth and when he comes out to mount, you can approach him, and not

At the expected time the tall, bovishlooking, clean shaved, handsome young Tarleton came out of his tent, and as he heared his charge he was confronted by the heroic Lydia Mackey, who in a few words made known the object of her visit. He quickly answered that he was in a great hurry, and could not at that time stop to consider her case. She said the case was urgent, that her husband had been condemned to die at sunrise tomorrow morning, and that he alone had the power to save his life. He replied: "Very well, my good woman, when I return later in the day I will inquire into the matter." Saying this he placed his foot in the stirrup, and sprang up, but before he could throw his right leg over the saddle, Mrs. Mr ey caught him by the coat and jerked him down. He turned upon her with a scowl, and she implored him to grant her request. He was greatly discomfitted, and angrily said he would look into the case on his return. He then attempted again to mouns, when she dragged him down a second time, begging him in eloquent terms to spare the life of her husband "Hut tut my good woman," said he, boil-ing with rage. "Do you know what you ing with rage. "Do you know what you are doing? Begone! I'll attend to thi at my convenience; not sooner.

So saying, he tried a third tin mount, and a third time Lydia Macket jerked him to the ground. Holding by he sword's scabbard and falling on he knees, she cried, "Draw your sword and slay me and my unborn babe, or give me the life of my husband, for I shall never let you go till you kill me or sign this document"-which she drew from her bosom and held up before his face.

Tarleton trembled, was as pale as

He answered, "Under guard in youder

"Order him to be brought here." And "Order him to be brought here." And soon Charley Mackey stood before the valiant Tarleton. "Sir," said he, "you have been convicted of bearing arms against his Majesty's government. Worse—you have been convicted of being a spy; you have dared to enter my lines in disguise as a spy and you cannot deny it. But for the sake of your wife, I will dispuse a full reschorage and some acceptance." give you a full pardon on condition that you will take an oath never again to bear

"Sir," said Charles Mackey, in firmest tones, "I cannot accept pardon on these terms. It must be unconditional or I must die.'

And poor Lydia Mackey cried out, "And I too must die;" and on her knees, holding on to Colonel Tarleton, she pleaded with such ferver and cloquence was no approach to the house from the rear, and his retreat was always effected with impunity.

Charles Mackey had been at home now captain, he said, with quivering lips, and

With this Lydia Mackey sank to the ground exhausted, and Colonel Tarleton mounted his charger and galloped off, doubtless happier for having spared the life of the heroic Lydia Mackey's husband.

Lydia Mackey in her old age was a fine talker. A boy of ten years old, I heard her tell this story with such feeling and earnestness that great tears rolled down her aged check to mingle with those of her little grandchildren gathered around her knees.

The name of Tarleton was execrated in South Carolina till a very late period. But the Lydia Mackey episode shows that he had a heart not wholly steeled against the noble feelings of humanity.

The history of our Revolutionary War can hardly present a more interesting tableau than that of Lydia Mackey begging the life of her husband at the hands of the brave and bloody Tarleton. It is altogether probable that the Lydia Mackey victory was the first ever gained over the redoubtable commander. My mother, Mahala Mackey, was born September 1, 1792, was the ninth and youngest child of Charles and Lydia Mackey, the subjects of this narrative.

mounted men, hurrahing for Marion and Davie, and shouting vengeance on the redcoats and Tories; and he began to shake hands enthusiastically with the "boys," and to ask particulars about the fight, when the ringicader of the gang coolly said: "Well, Charley, old fellow, we've set a good many traps for you, but never have baited 'em right till now. You are our prisoner."

And they marched him off just as he was, without hat or coat, without allowing him a moment to say a parting word to his poor wife.

It was now nearly daylight and they ordered him to pilot them to Andy Mcliwain's, with the hope of capturing him too. But he was bot at home. Then he was compelled to pilot them to James Truesdale's, and he was not at home.

From there they went to Lancaster village, and then to Col. Tarleton's head quarters, where Charley Mackey was tried by courtmartial, and sentenced to death as g Lpy.

The next day Mrs. Mackey, not knowing what had happined, gathered some fruit and eggs, and, with a basket well filled, she matie ner way to Col. Tarleton's ton's tamp. Hucksters were readily admitted when they had such luxuries to dispose of.

On getting within the lines she inquired the way to Colonel Tarleton's marquee, which was shown her. The Colonel was on parade, but a young officer, who was writing, asked her to be seated. After he had finished, he said, is the season in which bad or poisone blood is most apt to show itself. Nature, a this juncture, needs something to assist in throwing off the impurities which har collected by the sluggish circulation of blood during the cold winter monta swift's Specific is nature's great helper, at it is a purely vegetable alterative and tonic Rev. L. B. Paine, Macon, Ga., write, "We have been using Swift's Specific at the orphans' home as a remedy for blood cosplaints, and as a general health tonic, as have had remarkable results from its con the children and employees of the last fution. It is such an excellent tonic, as keeps the blood so pure, that the system it less liable to disease. It has cured some dour children of Scrofula."

W. H. Gilbert, druggist, Albany, G. writes: "We are selling large quantities a Swift's Specific for a Spring alterative as general health tonic, and with the best a sults. It is now largely used as a present ive and cure for Malaria. There are mar remarkable evidences of its merit in the section."
